Planning is for results

Planning is that element of Management that enables you to make things happen, rather than let things happen to you. "You" may be an individual, financing project, business, corporation or country

To engage successfully in business planning, you must be willing to take responsibility for your actions, or your decisions not to act; and must have strong desire not to fail. Business planning requires you to develop a strategy that addresses all probable eventualities. It helps determine the best series of action steps necessary for the management to reach the goals and to avoid or overcome foreseeable hurdles. Proper planning is an important and effective tool in financing your project and shaping your future.

Business planning consists of two key elements: the planning process and the business plan itself.

The Planning Process

The planning process is a sequence of activities or events that help you conceive your plan. The skills at gathering, and analyzing information, setting strategy, and decision-making are all utilized in this process. You may address a series of questions that help clarify your present situation, the future you desire, the means to obtaining that future, and the systems of delegation and accountability necessary to track and sustain the progress. As you proceed through the planning process, you comb through the possible outcomes of different courses of action. During this combing, you are forced to confront your vision, mission, core values, purposes, and priorities.

For example, while developing a plan for your business you might decide not to invest more than certain amount as a capital in the business, giving your self adequate resources to pursue your family and personal goals. You must acknowledge that, given our decision, you cannot expect to receive the same promotional consideration as someone willing to invest double the amount as capital. In short, every business person's strategy will be different, but all of them will involve some sort of sacrifice—"a road not taken". One individual may sacrifice economic success, or promotional sacrifice time with their children or recreation. The business planning process brings these considerations to the forefront and realistically assesses the trade-offs necessary for the management to reach the goals.

The Business Plan

The business plan is the output of your planning process for your project / business. It is a statement of the foundational assumptions, goals and strategies that you have decided to pursue, as well as the time, resources, and action steps necessary to achieve those goals in your business. Business plan, then, is a written summation distilled from the activities of the planning process. This written business plan allows others to understand your business goals and it can be used as a yardstick for reviewing performance. Just as the planning process is the catalyst of thinking through your future, the written business plan itself can serve as an important control element. Facilitating the planning process the plan requires expertise in both the financial aspects of management and the planning process itself. The value of a business plan is the decisions it influences, and ultimately, how much money in the bank as a result.
